Anansi was king of the spiders.

One day, a god gave him a present.

“This bag has all the wisdom
in the world.

Anansi, you
must share it.”

Anansi frowned. He didn't want to share it.

I could be the cleverest
in the world!

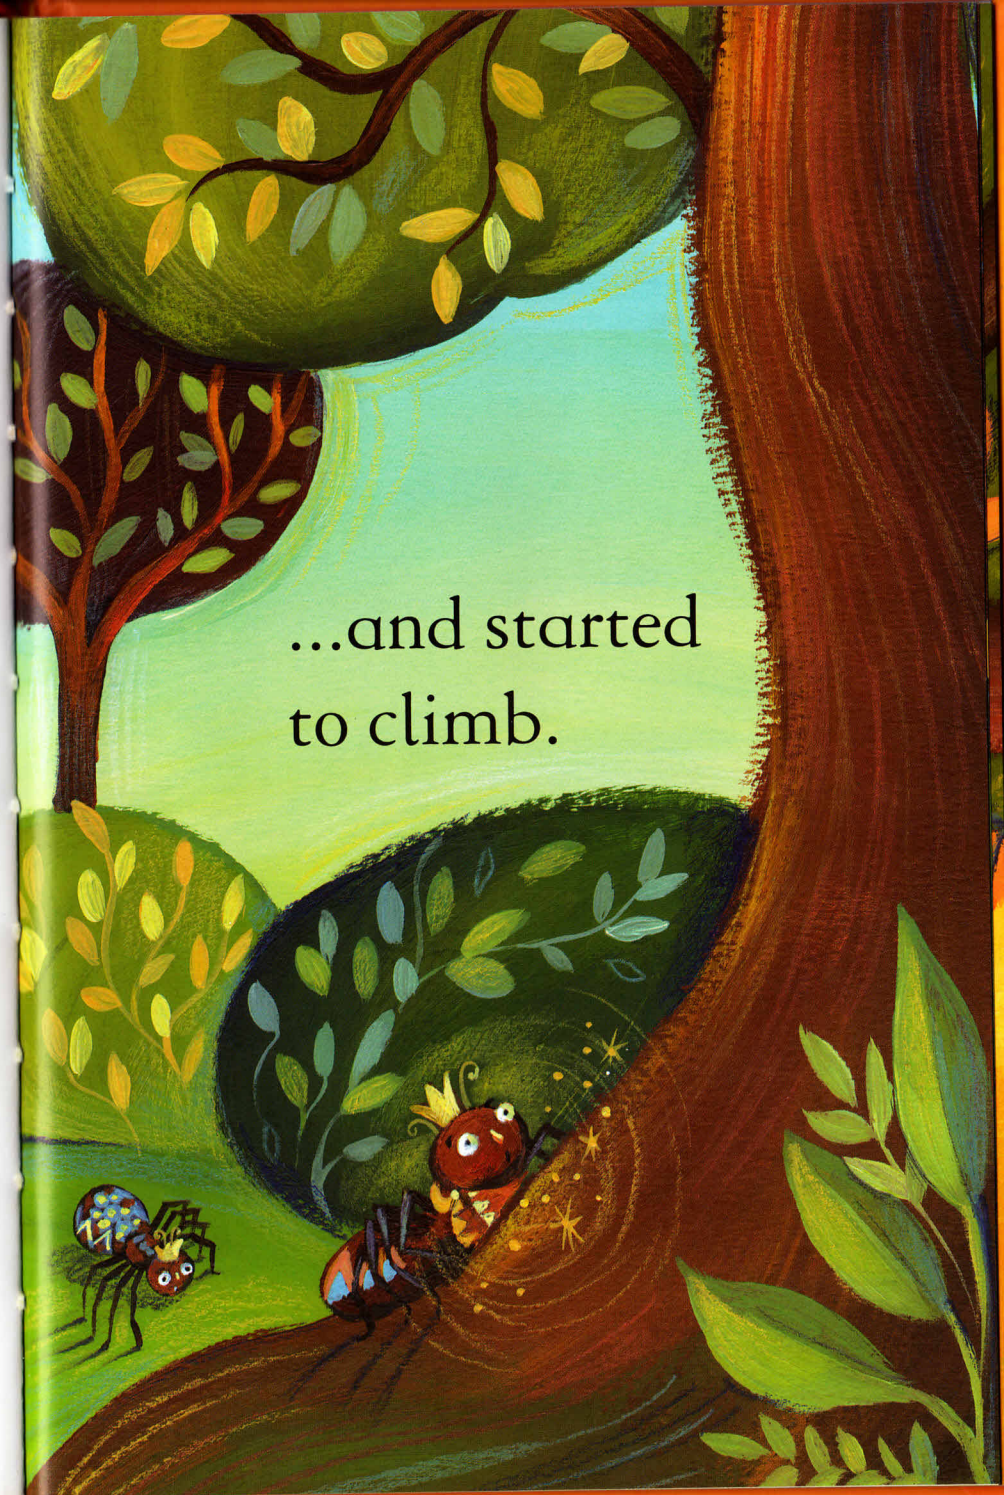

“I must hide the bag,”
he thought.

He found the tallest tree in the jungle...

...and started
to climb.

But the bag got
in the way.

Oof!

Oops!

Oh no!

His son tried to help.

Put the bag
on your back.

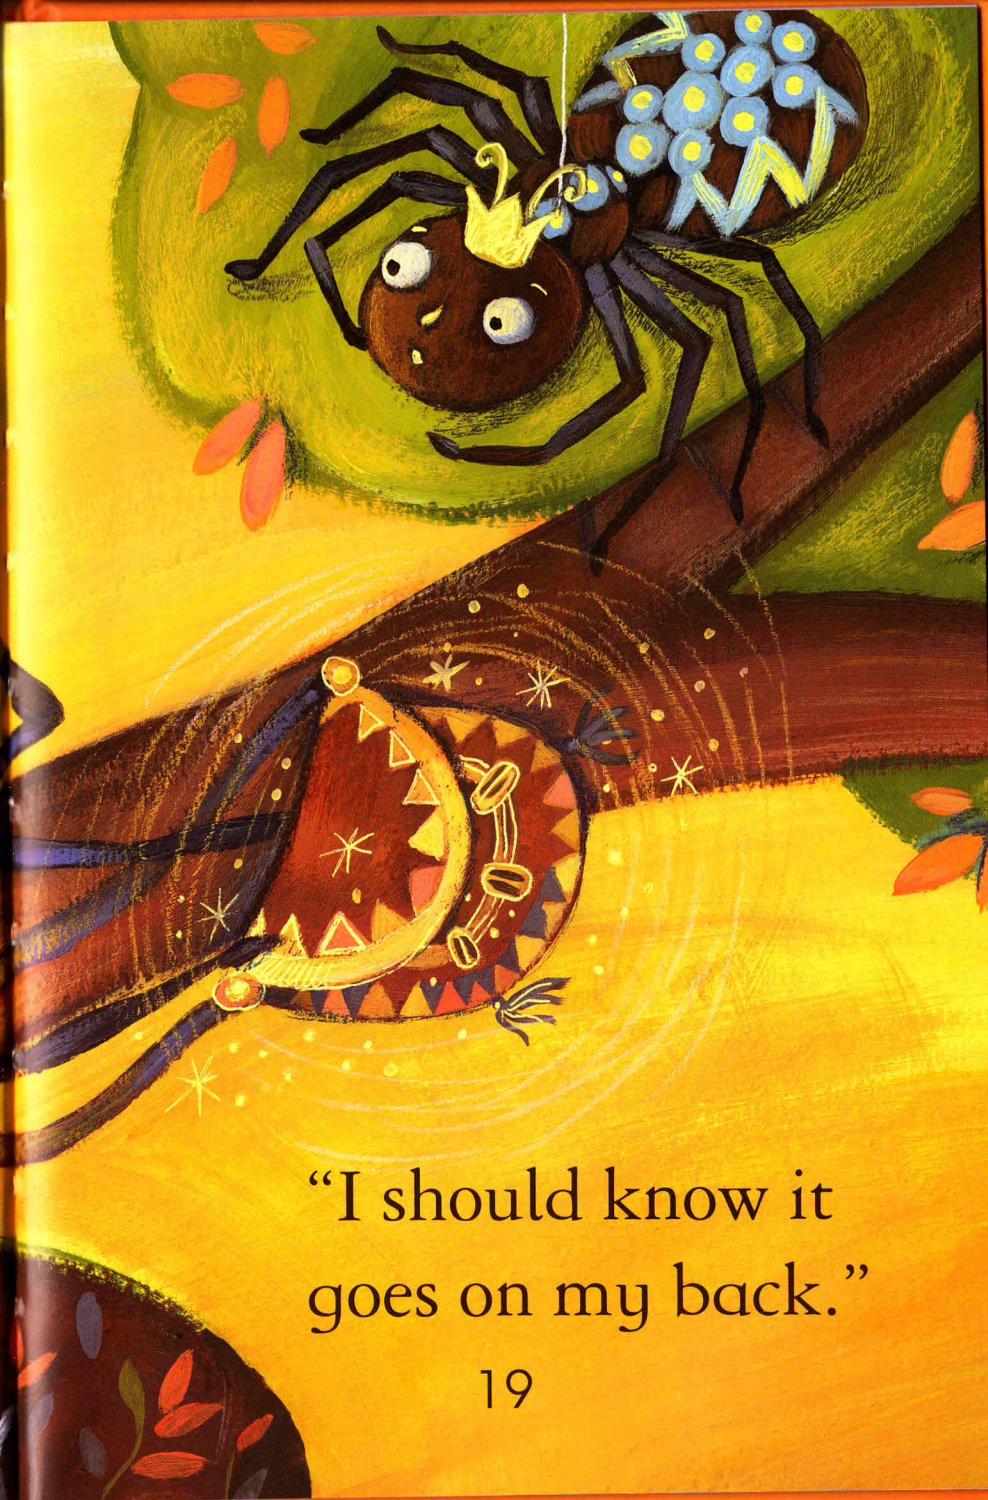

Hurray!
It worked.

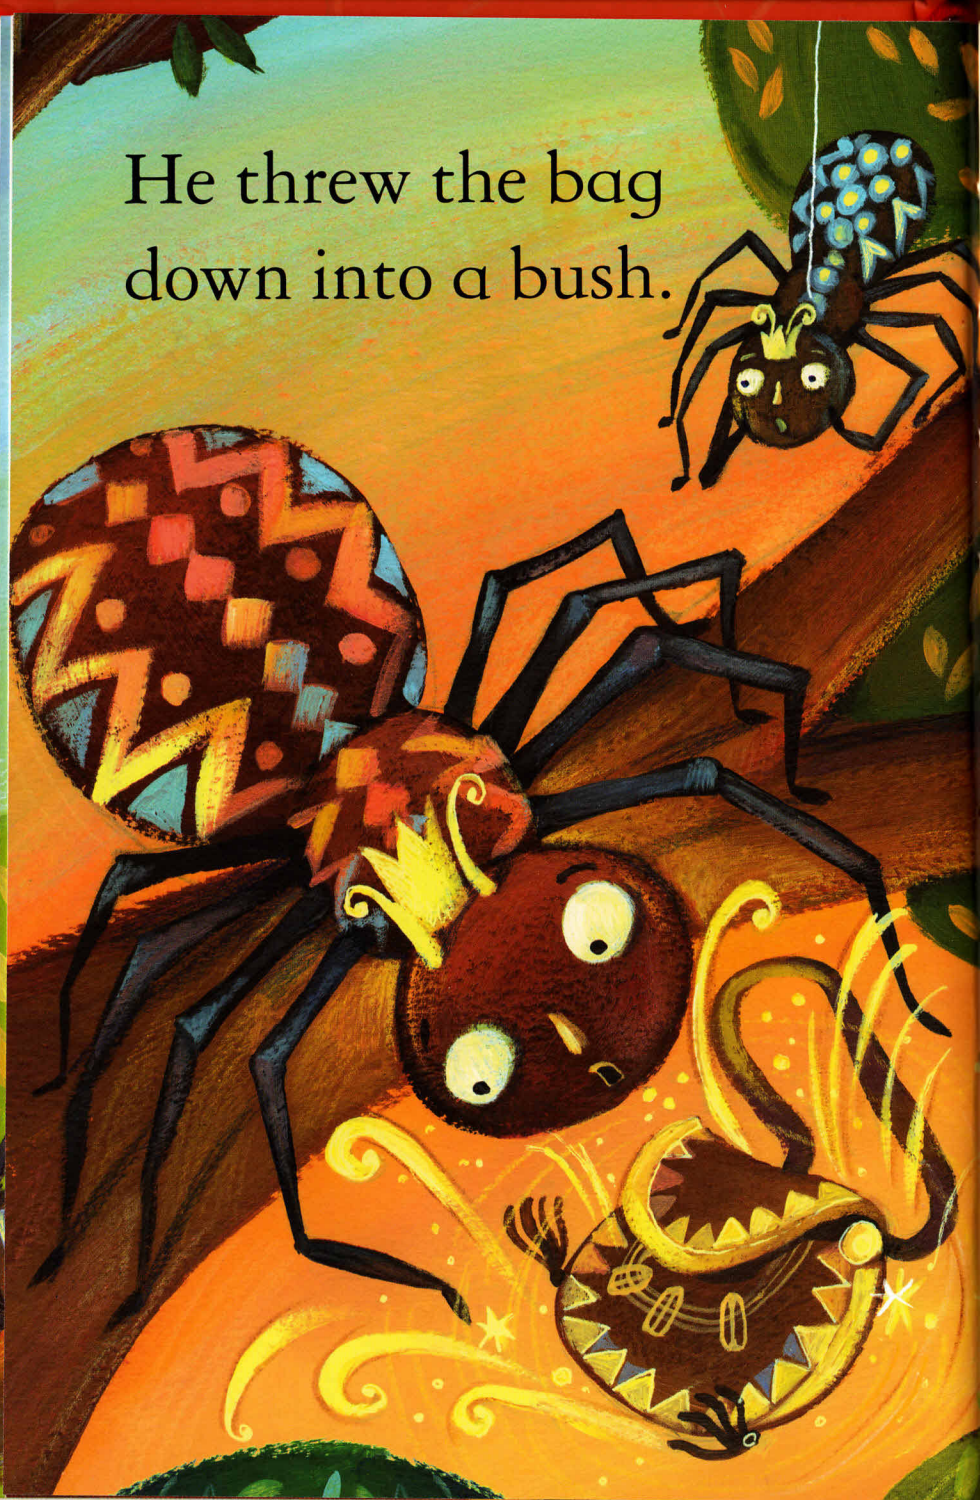

“But I have the bag of wisdom,” Anansi said.

“I should know it goes on my back.”

He threw the bag
down into a bush.

It burst open.

Wisdom flew all over the world.

Everyone had some.

Now everyone knows something...

...but no one knows
everything.

About Anansi

Anansi, the trickster spider, is a popular character in lots of West African and Caribbean folktales. In some stories, he appears as a man, or half-man, half-spider.
